Excerpt: .metastatic medullary foci, but from lymphocytes, without an intermediate stage such as the myelocyte. In this case the eosinophilic granules are presumed to originate from disintegrated hemoglobin, a view especially championed by Weidenreich. Though these conceptions apparently have little in their favor, they harmonize well with certain conditions obtaining in the case presented. Thus the eosinophils have been most numerous at the times when the lymphocytes were relatively few. Furthermore, as pointed out by Weidenreich, the eosinophils are likely to be increased when there is a diminution in the erythrocytes and evidence of an augmented destruction of the red cells.--Published in Bull.
