Then he hastened to the landing in the same boat which brought them to the ship, and took the next train for Washington. No sooner had he disappeared than everybody except Mrs. Cartmell began to ask questions of Mr. Cartmell. The secret he could keep no longer, so he made a brief explanation. Mr. French, my classmate and Miss Gray s especial friend, has been suddenly called away on very important business; he has therefore very kindly offered us the use and enjoyment of his steam yacht, Verbena. Now I propose to take you from day to day along the shore of the Eastern States. NEWPORT HARBOR. The captain and crew were instructed by Mr. French to receive, during his absence, their orders from Mr. Cartmell, so the latter said to the captain, Sail for New Bedford to-morrow, at 9 A. M. At the appointed hour the captain weighed anchor, and steamed out among the many beautiful yachts, the great Sound Steamers, tugs, revenue cutters, and coastwise schooners. The sail from Newport down Narragansett Bay to the open ocean was delightful, as they passed a number of islands, small bays, and points. The water that day was quite calm, so that no one suffered from that dreadful disease, sea-sickness. As they sailed along, the captain told them interesting stories, and the names of the islands and points which were passed. The approach to New Bedford is very delightful, as the...
